Gordon Lawrie's third novel is a romantic spy comedy set in contemporary Edinburgh.

Danny Marwick is a 'blogger' – he writes material to fill up catalogues and websites of firms looking to attract customers to buy their products. He's by far the best in the world and his work is in great demand. Danny is also a singer-songwriter in an Edinburgh pub a couple of nights each week. But if his blogging is world-class, his song-writing is awful. So, too, is his love life.

One day he's approached by a mysterious woman who offers him a lot of money to write holiday brochures for highly unlikely destinations. Somehow the two of them take to each other and she even encourages him to write some new songs. In no time at all, however, he's caught up in a world of spies where nobody is quite what they seem, and he finds his life in real danger...

About The Author

Born in 1952, Gordon Lawrie has lived and worked all of his life in Edinburgh. In 2011 he gave up for good working as a teacher to write novels, short stories and other work.

His first novel, Four Old Geezers And A Valkyrie was published by Comely Bank Publishing in 2013, followed by The Discreet Charm of Mary Maxwell-Hume in 2017. The Blogger Who Came in from the Cold is his third novel.

An unusual feature of Gordon Lawrie's writing is that in many cases there is original music to accompany it. Some of this can be heard on his website or at author events.
